Alexandria Gazette

WEDNESDAY EVENING, AUGUST 9.

From Darkness Into Light.

I'm sitting alone in the gloaming, Whilst shadows are failing fast, And the mellow twilight is peopled With faces and forms of the past. I see, through the mists of distance, The friends that I used to know-Friends? ab! more-the loved ones -Loved and lost in the long ago.

Oh, memory, why dost thou bear me Through the gleam and gloom again Through the damp, gray mists of the valley, Which only bring me pain? Cans, thou give me back also the glory Of golden-hued joys that are flee? Canst thou recreate toys from ashes, Or give me back hopes that are dead?

But a low, gentle voice whispers sadly, Still, the future has gladness in store; And yet of the past you ask blindly Such gitts as it cannot restore. Know you not in life's goblet the sweetness With bitterness also has part?

And he who of sorrow tastes truly Gains light and new strength for his heart? Then over my spirit there cometh

A peace that is bissful and calm; Into wounds that are sore beyond healing here stealeth a dew that is balm. Yes, memory wafts me most gently Back through scenes that change as I go, And, as in a dream, I see pictured That besutiful long ago.

I see the loved ones of my childhood With sorrow that yet is not pain; For they smile and murmur most softly, Mourn not we will meet you again. Ah! yes, though lost for a season,

In the past I am living again, And I feel now I would not have severed One link from fond memory's chain. 'Tis said that life's crown of sorrows

Is remembrance of happier things; But memory seems to have borne me To-night on angels wings-Back through the portal of sorrows Into my childhood again,

Where the future seems bright, And the present, free from trouble or pain. Yes, the dark purple mists which divide us To night have rolled back from the past, Now a finger points onward and upward

To the sunlight which always shall last. So I pray-and Sandalphon, the angel, Bears my voice through realms of the air, Tho' the night of the past may divide us, May we meet in the dawning up there.
